INTRODUCTION

Plaintiffs' state-law claims in Chulsky, Riordan, and Bready challenge an alleged ongoing federal intelligence-gathering program that is, according to Plaintiffs' own allegations, being used to support the defense of the nation from foreign attack. As described in the complaints, the alleged program could not have been carried out without Verizon's alleged involvement.

Plaintiffs have brought their claims with the avowed purpose of seeking to "halt" Verizon's alleged cooperation with the NSA. Chulsky Am. Compl. ¶ 2. If successful, Plaintiffs would use state laws to (i) declare the carriers' alleged cooperation illegal; (ii) enjoin the carriers from further alleged cooperation; and (iii) impose crippling monetary sanctions for their alleged cooperation. Plaintiffs' claims would thus intrude into the exclusively federal field of military affairs in a manner that is far more than incidental or indirect, and they are therefore preempted by the Constitution. (See Part I below). Plaintiffs' claims are also barred for another wholly independent reason: Their claims would use state law to obstruct and prohibit the alleged federal program described in the complaints in violation of the Supremacy Clause's intergovernmental immunity doctrine. (See Part II below.)

The case for barring Plaintiffs' state law claims here is even stronger than the one presented in the cases concerning state public utility commission investigations of alleged carrier cooperation with the NSA that were recently addressed by the Court (the "State Cases"). Unlike those cases, which at least at this stage were only seeking information concerning carriers' alleged cooperation with the NSA, the thrust of these cases is to regulate the manner in which the federal government conducts its alleged program by stopping the carriers' alleged cooperation and imposing potentially massive damages on the carriers as punishment for their alleged cooperation.

Finally, the Chulsky Plaintiffs' state-law claims for breach of contract and misrepresentation also must be rejected because Plaintiffs have failed to meet the basic pleading requirements of Rules 8 and 9. (See Parts III and IV below.)

ARGUMENT

I. PLAINTIFFS' STATE-LAW CLAIMS ARE PREEMPTED

A. The Claims Intrude On The Exclusively Federal Field Of Military Affairs

It is well settled that military affairs—including tactical operations, the conduct of war, intelligence gathering, and the protection of the country against foreign attack—are committed to the national government's "plenary and exclusive" control. Tarble's Case, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 397, 408 (1871); see also Perpich v. Dep't of Def., 496 U.S. 334, 353 (1990) ("[S]everal constitutional provisions commit matters of foreign policy and military affairs to the exclusive control of the National Government."); Deutsch v. Turner Corp., 324 F.3d 692, 712 (9th Cir. 2003) ("Matters related to war are for the federal government alone to address."). Indeed, military affairs lie at the "inner core" of what has been described more generally as the federal government's "foreign affairs" power. Deutsch, 324 F.3d at 711 (emphasis added); see also State Cases Order (Dkt. # 334) at 29-30. If anything, military affairs are even more committed by the Constitution to the federal government's exclusive control than "foreign affairs" or foreign relations. It is also equally well settled (and unchallenged by the Plaintiffs) that the federal power over military affairs includes the authority to gather intelligence and maintain its confidentiality. See Dep't of Navy v. Egan, 484 U.S. 518, 527-528 (1988); Snepp v. United States, 444 U.S. 507, 509 n.3 (1980); Totten v. United States, 92 U.S. 105, 106 (1875); United States v. Marchetti, 466 F.2d 1309, 1315 (4th Cir. 1972).

These holdings rest on the Framers' decision—reflected throughout the Constitution's text and structure—to allocate all authority over military affairs to the federal government. See Deutsch, 324 F.3d at 711-712; In re World War II Era Japanese Forced Labor Litig., 164 F. Supp. 2d 1160, 1168-1171 (N.D. Cal. 2001), aff'd sub nom. Deutsch, 324 F.3d 692; State Cases Order at 29-30; see also U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1 (granting Congress power "to provide for the common Defence"); id. cl. 11 (power to "declare War"); id. cl. 12 ("raise and support Armies"); id. cl. 13 ("provide and maintain a Navy"); id. cl. 15 ("provide for calling forth the Militia to . . . suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions"); id. art. II, § 1, cl. 1 (vesting "executive Power" in the President); id. § 2, cl. 1 (making President "Commander in Chief"). The Constitution categorically disables states from

1 acting in the field of military affairs, making an exception only for the extraordinary circumstance of 2 actual invasion or imminent danger. Id. art. I, § 10, cl. 3. The Constitution denies authority to states 3 in this field because “[t]he common defence of the members” was one of the “principal purposes to 4 be answered by [the] Union.” The Federalist No. 23, at 146-147 (Hamilton) (Jacob E. Cooke ed.
5 1961). Experience under the Articles of Confederation had demonstrated that leaving the common 6 defense to be provided for by the states would be “dangerous to all, and baneful to the confederacy.”
7 The Federalist No. 25, at 158 (Hamilton) (Cooke ed. 1961); see also The Federalist No. 80, at 535
8 (Hamilton) (Cooke ed. 1961) (“[T]he peace of the WHOLE ought not to be left at the disposal of a 9 PART.”).

10 Because the Constitution allocates exclusive authority over the conduct of military affairs to 11 the federal government, states cannot act in this field regardless of whether their action may be said 12 to conflict with federal law. As this Court recognized, state intrusion into a field reserved by the 13 Constitution exclusively to the federal government is preempted “whether or not consistent” with 14 federal policy. State Cases Order at 29 (citation omitted); see also id. at 31 (state law with more 15 than “incidental or indirect effect” on foreign relations is unconstitutional (discussing Zschernig v.
16 Miller, 389 U.S. 429 (1968))). Plaintiffs’ contrary view (Pls.’ Joint Opp’n to Verizon’s Mot. to 17 Dismiss Chulsky, Riordan, & Bready Compls. (Opp’n) at 15-17) would permit a state to declare or 18 even wage war against another country, so long as the federal government was pursuing the same 19 course. But the Constitution allows no such thing. The Supreme Court decided as much when it 20 held in Tarble’s Case that state courts could not exercise habeas jurisdiction to determine the 21 validity of the enlistment of soldiers in the U.S. military in alleged violation of federal law. 80 U.S.
22 (13 Wall.) at 408, 411. While states traditionally had broad authority to issue habeas writs, id. at 23 409, they simply had no power to exercise that authority in the field of military affairs, id. at 408-
24 411. That constitutional prohibition did not depend on whether the state court’s habeas decision 25 would conflict with what a federal court would have decided. Id. at 411.

26 Here, Plaintiffs’ state-law claims intrude on the exclusively federal field of military affairs 27 and have more than an “incidental or indirect” effect on the alleged activities of the federal 28 government. State Cases Order at 31. The complaints directly attack the lawfulness, under state

1 law, of the alleged collection of military intelligence by the federal government—through the NSA, 2 a component of the Defense Department—with the obvious and intended effect of prohibiting the 3 federal government from operating the alleged military intelligence program in the manner it has 4 allegedly chosen. For example, the Chulsky Plaintiffs challenge Verizon’s alleged act of 5 “permitting” the NSA to “detect intelligence” needed to “warn appropriate officials of potential 6 terrorist activities” and protect against the “continuing threat” from “al Qaeda and related terrorist 7 organizations.” Chulsky Am. Compl. ¶¶ 1, 3, 17-18, 25. They further allege that the equipment 8 allegedly used to carry out the alleged intelligence-gathering “could not have been installed, 9 operated and/or maintained by the NSA without the authorization of Defendants.” Id. ¶ 21; see also, 10 e.g., Bready Compl. ¶¶ 1, 13-14 (challenging Defendants’ alleged participation in “Governmental 11 program” “to search for terrorist activity” in the wake of the September 11, 2001 attacks); Riordan
12 Compl. ¶¶ 1-2, 14, 16 (alleging that Defendants provided data to NSA and other agencies required 13 for investigative purposes). In addition, the relief that Plaintiffs seek would purport to control the 14 federal government’s alleged methods of collecting intelligence and prohibit certain alleged methods 15 of doing so; indeed, that is the whole point of Plaintiffs’ lawsuits. Plaintiffs have requested that 16 Verizon’s alleged cooperation with the NSA be declared unlawful and that any further cooperation 17 with the alleged program be enjoined. Further, Plaintiffs seek to punish Verizon by imposing 18 crushing damages for its alleged cooperation with the federal government. See Chulsky Am. Compl.
19 ¶¶ 2, A-H; Bready Compl. ¶¶ B-D; Riordan Compl. ¶ (b). Thus, wherever the precise boundary 20 might lie between state action that has merely an incidental or indirect effect in the preempted field 21 and state action that intrudes into that field, this is not a close case. Plaintiffs’ attempt to use state 22 law to dictate how the alleged military intelligence-gathering activities of the federal government 23 should be carried out is far more than an “incidental or indirect” effect and amounts to a substantial 24 and direct intrusion by state law on a field of responsibility the Constitution allocates exclusively to 25 the federal government. State Cases Order at 31; In re World War II, 164 F. Supp. 2d at 1171.¹

27 ¹ This case thus stands in sharp contrast to International Association of Independent Tanker Owners
28 v. Locke, 148 F.3d 1053, 1069 (9th Cir. 1998), rev’d on other grounds, United States v. Locke, 529
U.S. 89 (2000), addressed in the State Cases Order (at 33-34). As the Ninth Circuit noted, the state regulations at issue in Locke did not clearly have any extraterritorial effect at all, let alone one that

1 It is no answer to suggest that there is no unconstitutional intrusion here because state laws of 2 general applicability are involved. Opp’n at 14-15, 17. The application of state law can be 3 unconstitutional even if the state statutes in question are laws of general applicability directed at 4 traditional state concerns. See State Cases Order at 30-31. The issue, as correctly framed by the 5 Court, is simply whether the application of state law in the particular case would intrude, or have 6 more than an indirect effect, on an exclusively federal field. Id. at 33-34. After all, Zschernig itself 7 was about a law of general applicability whose application was being challenged as unconstitutional.
8 389 U.S. at 432-34. Likewise, in Tarble’s Case, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 397, the Court held that the state 9 could not exercise its traditional authority to issue writs of habeas corpus—a generally applicable 10 police power with no express purpose of affecting military affairs—in a case involving the United 11 States military. Id. at 408, 411. Thus, under these cases, for example, a neutral state law of general 12 applicability establishing acceptable ambient noise levels could not be used to stop the military from 13 flying overhead to protect the country because it would infringe on the exclusively federal sphere of 14 military affairs. Similarly, the relief Plaintiffs request here—prohibiting the continued operation of 15 an alleged military intelligence-gathering program or controlling how that alleged program is 16 conducted—would be at odds with the constitutional allocation of power between the states and the 17 federal government, no matter whether it was based on a law of general applicability or a law aimed 18 specifically at the NSA’s alleged activities.

19 In addition, the effect of Plaintiffs’ claims on the alleged intelligence-gathering activities of 20 the federal government is far more direct and disruptive than in the State Cases. In those cases, at 21 least at this stage, several public utility commissions (“PUCs”) were relying on state laws to gather 22 information from the carriers about their alleged cooperation with the government. The Court 23 reasoned that although the state investigations may have an effect on an exclusively federal field, 24 “that effect [was] only incidental and indirect.” State Cases Order at 34. Here, by contrast, 25 Plaintiffs do not seek to gather information, but ask for injunctive and other relief that would have 26 the effect of prohibiting the federal government from operating the alleged military intelligence

27 was more than “incidental or indirect,” nor did they otherwise rise to the level of an unconstitutional 28 intrusion into an exclusively federal field. Id.

1 program in the manner it has allegedly chosen. There can be no question that this direct constraint 2 on an alleged federal military program constitutes a substantial and direct intrusion on the 3 exclusively federal field.

4 Further, the unconstitutional intrusion here does not turn on whether Plaintiffs' claims target 5 a specific foreign country. Although many of the cases finding preemption due to the exclusive 6 federal authority over "foreign affairs" have arisen in a context in which state action would have had 7 an effect on a particular foreign nation, see State Cases Order at 32 (citing cases), nothing in the case 8 law suggests that states are free to dictate how the federal government conducts foreign affairs as 9 long as they do not target a particular foreign country. And none of those cases involves the issue 10 presented here—the effect of state law on an alleged ongoing military operation. Clearly, many 11 actions taken as part of the defense of this country are intended to guard against external threats 12 generally, rather than against a specific country, and states are disabled from regulating those 13 activities. Thus, if the federal government were to deploy a "missile defense shield" to protect the 14 nation against attack, a state would be preempted from taking action to prohibit or disrupt that 15 military action, even if the shield was not deployed with any particular foreign country in mind.
16 Likewise, a state could not prohibit companies from doing business with the Department of Defense, 17 regardless of whether that prohibition would affect any particular foreign nation or even foreign 18 relations or diplomacy more generally.

19 Finally, the fact that state law claims are brought against a private party in the first instance, 20 rather than against the government itself, does not alter this analysis. Opp'n at 14. Thus, in Stehney
21 v. Perry, a state law that applied to private contractors had the effect of preventing private entities 22 from serving as NSA contractors, an effect the court found to be not only in conflict with federal 23 law, but also "an impermissible state interference with exclusive federal responsibility in matters of 24 national security." 101 F.3d 925, 939 (3d Cir. 1996). Likewise, "[s]tates and localities may not 25 enact legislation that impedes or hinders the national defense, regardless of whether the defense 26 activities are carried out directly by agencies of the federal government, or by private contractors 27 acting as agents of the federal government." United States v. City of Oakland, No. C-89-3305 JPV, 28 slip op. at 7 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 23, 1990) (Ex. 1 to Verizon Mem. in Supp. of Mot. to Dismiss Chulsky,

1 Riordan, Bready Compls. (“Verizon Mem.”)) (invalidating local ordinance prohibiting private firms
2 under contract to federal government from engaging in nuclear weapons work); cf. Gartrell Constr.
3 Inc. v. Aubry, 940 F.2d 437, 441 (9th Cir. 1991) (federal government contractor exempt from state
4 licensing requirements); West River Elec. Ass’n v. Black Hills Power & Light Co., 918 F.2d 713, 716
5 n.6 (8th Cir. 1990) (“[A] state cannot diminish the constitutional authority of the United States
6 government by regulating the parties with whom it may contract.” (citation omitted)).²

7 B. Plaintiffs’ Remaining Arguments Are Without Merit

8 Plaintiffs’ remaining arguments fare no better and should be rejected.

9 1. There is no basis in the Court’s Remand Order—nor in the recent State Cases Order—for 10 Plaintiffs to assert that Verizon’s motion to dismiss is simply a “replay” of the federal common law 11 arguments Verizon presented in opposition to remand. Opp’n at 11. The Court’s remand decision 12 did not even address, let alone decide, the constitutional question presented in this motion.
13 Moreover, the Court’s decision in the State Cases discussed the constitutional issues without 14 suggesting they had already been resolved by the analysis of federal common law in the Court’s 15 remand decision.

16 The jurisdictional question raised by the remand motion was whether federal law creates an 17 exclusive cause of action, such that Plaintiffs’ claims—although nominally pleaded under state 18 law—in fact arise under federal law. In re NSA Telecomms. Records Litig., 483 F. Supp. 2d 934, 19 938 (N.D. Cal. 2007) (“Remand Order”); see also Beneficial Nat’l Bank v. Anderson, 539 U.S. 1, 8, 20 11 (2003). With respect to federal common law as a basis for complete preemption, the Court ruled 21 that “[c]ases justifying judicial creation of preemptive federal rules are extremely limited,” because 22 it is “primarily a decision for Congress” whether federal law should displace state law. Remand 23

24 ² If anything, the intrusion here is all the more unconstitutional precisely because of the 25 alleged involvement of a private party. The Constitution provides for a national government with 26 which all of its citizens have a direct relationship. See U.S. Term Limits, Inc. v. Thornton, 514 U.S.
27 779, 821 (1995); see also, e.g., The Federalist No. 15, at 93 (Hamilton) (Cooke ed. 1961); The 28 Federalist No. 39 (Madison) (Cooke ed. 1961). The Constitution permits no role for the states to interpose themselves between citizens and the national government. See, e.g., Cook v. Gralike, 531 U.S. 510, 527 (2001) (Kennedy, J., concurring). Thus, a state has no power to interfere with alleged communications between the federal government and one of its citizens—particularly if those communications involve military affairs and defending the nation from attack, as Plaintiffs allege.

1 Order, 483 F. Supp. 2d at 940. Complete preemption of state law by judge-made federal common 2 law, the Court explained, was therefore appropriate only in rare cases of “significant conflict” 3 between state and federal law in an area of “uniquely federal interest.” Id. The Court concluded that 4 neither federal statutory law nor federal common law completely preempted the state-law claims, 5 because Congress had not expressed an intent to displace state law, and because this was not one of 6 those unusual cases in which a “significant conflict” between state law and federal policy justified
7 the Court’s reaching out to do what Congress had refrained from doing. Id. at 940-941.³

8 Unlike the complete preemption inquiry in the motion to remand, the source of preemption 9 asserted here is neither a federal statute nor federal common law—it is the Constitution itself. In this 10 context, the application of state law is unconstitutional—regardless of any conflict with federal 11 statutory or common law and regardless of the existence of a substitute federal cause of action—
12 because it is being used to regulate in the exclusively federal field of military intelligence. As noted 13 above, no conflict between state and federal law is required in this setting, as it was to justify the 14 creation of federal common law. In addition, Verizon’s argument here does not ask the Court to 15 create substantive federal common law to displace the state-law claims, but simply to apply the 16 Constitution to determine that the application of state law impermissibly intrudes into a field 17 entrusted exclusively to the federal government. The Remand Order did not consider this issue.

18 2. For much the same reasons, Plaintiffs’ invocation of the so-called “presumption against 19 preemption” and their extended discussion of congressional preemption (Opp’n at 6-11) are 20 irrelevant. The presumption against preemption is a rule of interpretation applied when determining 21 whether Congress has acted with an intent to displace state law. E.g., English v. Gen. Elec. Co., 496
22 U.S. 72, 79 (1990). But congressional intent has no bearing here because it is the Constitution 23 itself—not an affirmative act of Congress—that renders states powerless to intrude into the field of 24 military affairs. Moreover, the presumption applies only where state authority is exercised in an 25 area traditionally occupied by the states. Locke, 529 U.S. at 107-108. Where state law regulates in 26 an area with a “history of significant federal presence,” the presumption simply has no application.

27 ³ Verizon respectfully disagrees with these conclusions and preserves all arguments presented to the 28 Court opposing the remand motion.

1 Id. at 108. In this case, Plaintiffs’ claims would inject state law into an area—the alleged gathering 2 of military intelligence—where the federal presence is not only “significant,” but also exclusive.

3 3. Likewise, Plaintiffs’ argument that provisions of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act 4 (FISA), 50 U.S.C. §§ 1806(f), 1861, contemplate a role for state-court litigation (Opp’n at 10) is 5 irrelevant. The federal government occupies the entire field of military affairs because the 6 Constitution—not Congress—commits that field to exclusive federal control. It is highly doubtful 7 that Congress even has the authority to trump the constitutional allocation of power between the 8 state and federal governments. Even if Congress had such authority, however, it would need to 9 exercise it in the most unmistakable terms. Cf. Hancock v. Train, 426 U.S. 167, 178-179 (1976) 10 (under intergovernmental immunity doctrine, states may not directly regulate federal government 11 without “clear and unambiguous” authorization by Congress); Shamrock Farms Co. v. Veneman, 12 146 F.3d 1177, 1180 (9th Cir. 1998) (congressional intent must be “unmistakably clear” to authorize 13 state regulation that would otherwise violate the dormant Commerce Clause). But there is no such 14 clear statement in FISA. The possibility that Congress may have implicitly meant to leave room for 15 state-court litigation that does not intrude into the field of military affairs—for example, a state 16 prosecution using evidence derived from an electronic surveillance, see, e.g., Missouri v. Isa, 850 17 S.W.2d 876, 887-888 (Mo. 1993) (discussing 50 U.S.C. § 1806)—does not clearly and 18 unambiguously authorize state-law claims that do intrude into the federal field. Nor does the 19 creation of a safe harbor for those who provide records pursuant to a FISA order, 50 U.S.C.
20 § 1861(e), provide a clear statement of intent to authorize states to prohibit or control federal 21 military programs that fall outside the safe harbor (particularly where the statute does not even 22 mention states or state law, id.). The scope of FISA therefore has no bearing on whether Plaintiffs’ 23 claims are constitutionally preempted.

24 4. Finally, Plaintiffs’ reliance (Opp’n at 15-16) on American Insurance Association v.
25 Garamendi, 539 U.S. 396 (2003), is misplaced. The Court explained there that, under Zschernig, 26 “state action with more than incidental effect on foreign affairs is preempted, even absent any 27 affirmative federal activity in the subject area of the state law, and hence without any showing of 28 conflict.” 539 U.S. at 418 (emphasis added). Contrary to Plaintiffs’ suggestion, Garamendi did not

1 purport to overrule Zschernig or hold that conflict with federal law is required before state law will 2 be constitutionally preempted. Indeed, the Court specifically disclaimed such a result. Id. at 419-
3 420. The Court simply found it unnecessary to rely on Zschernig, since the case before it presented 4 a clear conflict between state and federal law. Id. at 420. Nor did Garamendi hold that a court 5 should evaluate the relative weights of the federal and state interests before finding preemption. Id.
6 at 425. The Constitution has already struck that balance in favor of the federal interests.

7 II. PLAINTIFFS' CLAIMS VIOLATE THE SUPREMACY CLAUSE

8 As the Court explained most recently in its order in the State Cases, under the Supremacy
9 Clause, the intergovernmental immunity doctrine prohibits state law from regulating or obstructing 10 the activities of the federal government. State Cases Order at 16; see also Mayo v. United States, 11 319 U.S. 441, 445 (1943); McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316 (1819). That doctrine is 12 violated here because Plaintiffs seek to employ state law to prohibit the alleged federal program 13 described in their complaints and dictate the manner in which the federal government conducts its 14 alleged intelligence-gathering activities.

15 Citing North Dakota v. United States, 495 U.S. 423 (1990), Plaintiffs contend that the 16 Supremacy Clause is not violated here because they have brought their state-law claims against a 17 private company, not against the federal government itself. Accordingly, they assert, any 18 interference with the government as a result of their claims—no matter its nature or magnitude—is 19 merely the permissible incident of state regulation of private parties under a neutral law of general 20 applicability. Opp'n at 19-20. Contrary to Plaintiffs' contention, however, North Dakota did not 21 purport to establish a per se rule that state regulation that operates initially on a private party can 22 never violate the intergovernmental immunity doctrine. Rather, the plurality found that the state 23 regulation at issue (state liquor laws imposing a reporting and labeling requirement on suppliers) did 24 not violate the Supremacy Clause because it merely raised prices for liquor sold on military bases in 25 North Dakota and, even though that raised the government's costs, it did not directly interfere with 26 the government's operations. 495 U.S. at 436-438. The Court specifically distinguished the liquor 27 laws before it from cases in which the federal government was regulated "directly," id. at 436-437, 28 including Hancock v. Train, 426 U.S. 167 (1976), which addressed a state law that operated initially

1 on private parties, id. at 174 n.23. Similarly, in United States v. New Mexico, 455 U.S. 720 (1982), 2 the Court upheld a state tax on federal government contractors because it did not “direct[ly]
3 interfer[e] with the functions of government itself.” Id. at 736 (citation omitted). The Court 4 nonetheless recognized that “of course . . . state taxes on contractors are constitutionally invalid if 5 they . . . substantially interfere with [the Federal Government’s] activities.” Id. at 735 n.11.

6 Thus, even where the immediate impact of state law operates in the first instance on a private 7 party, the application of state law will still violate the Supremacy Clause if it has the effect of 8 directly obstructing or regulating the activities of the federal government. And case law leaves no 9 doubt that this line is crossed when, as here, state law is being used to prohibit alleged federal 10 activities. In Hancock, 426 U.S. 167, for example, the Supreme Court held that, absent a clear 11 statement by Congress, a state could not apply a permit requirement to federal facilities—including 12 facilities operated by private parties on behalf of the federal government, id. at 174 n.23—because, 13 even though the state might grant the permit, the mere fact of requiring compliance with the state 14 permit requirement was “tantamount to prohibiting” the federal activities, id. at 180. The controlling 15 principle was that “the federal function must be left free,” id. at 179 (emphasis added, citation 16 omitted)—a principle that applies regardless of whether the states attempt to block those federal 17 “activities,” id., by applying their law to the federal government or to private parties. Relying on 18 Hancock, the Supreme Court later reaffirmed that the Supremacy Clause precludes state regulation 19 that would prohibit federal activities or “dictate the manner in which [they] are carried out,” even 20 where “the federal function is carried out by a private contractor,” unless Congress “clearly 21 authorizes such regulation.” Goodyear Atomic Corp. v. Miller, 486 U.S. 174, 181 & n.3 (1988).

22 The Ninth Circuit has similarly held that state regulation “must give way” when it blocks the 23 activities of the federal government, regardless of “whether the United States exercises its rights 24 directly or through the use of private persons.” Union Oil Co. v. Minier, 437 F.2d 408, 411 (9th Cir.
25 1970). In Union Oil, local authorities—relying on neutral laws of general applicability—brought 26 state-law charges to abate a public nuisance against private companies developing the outer 27 continental shelf under federally-granted oil and gas leases. Although the federal government was 28 neither a defendant nor the object of state regulation in the first instance, the Court of Appeals

1 nevertheless held that the objective of the state-law actions was to “cause the cessation of 2 operations” under the federal leases and thus would “completely frustrate” the federal government’s 3 authority to develop the continental shelf through use of private leases. Id. at 411. The state-law 4 claims were therefore impermissible, id. at 411 & n.4 (citing Mayo, 319 U.S. 441), even though they 5 operated in the first instance on the private lessees, not the government itself. Any other result 6 would permit state law to be used to accomplish indirectly what it cannot do directly. See Black 7 Hills Power & Light Co. v. Weinberger, 808 F.2d 665, 669 & n.4 (8th Cir. 1987) (“[A] state cannot 8 diminish the constitutional authority of the United States government by regulating the parties with 9 whom it may contract.”).

10 Here, Plaintiffs’ assertion of state-law claims against the private defendants would, if 11 successful, have the effect of prohibiting the federal government’s alleged activities. Unlike the 12 state laws at issue in North Dakota and New Mexico, Plaintiffs’ claims here do not seek to impose a 13 state tax or regulation on routine business practices that merely makes it more costly for the 14 government to do business. Rather, as noted above in Part I.A, Plaintiffs’ own allegations make 15 clear that they seek to enjoin Verizon from allegedly assisting at all in the government’s alleged 16 military intelligence-gathering activities. Plaintiffs would thus prohibit those alleged activities 17 outright, unless the federal government conforms its alleged program to Plaintiffs’ understanding of 18 state law. See also Plfs.’ Joint Opp’n to Verizon’s Mot. to Dismiss Master Consolidated Compl. at 1 19 (goal of suit against Verizon is for alleged government surveillance program to “finally be ended”).

20 For the same reasons, Plaintiffs’ claims here are not like the state-law actions this Court
21 considered in its recent decision in the State Cases. Unlike the PUCs, Plaintiffs are not using state 22 law to seek information about whether Verizon cooperated in the alleged federal program; they are 23 trying to stop the alleged cooperation entirely. See State Cases Order at 18 (distinguishing Hancock 24 on the ground that the state investigations did not seek to “place[] a prohibition on the federal 25 government”). And unlike the PUCs, Plaintiffs here are seeking not simply to investigate the 26 alleged intelligence-gathering activities of the federal government, but to dictate the manner in 27 which the government carries out those alleged activities by prohibiting the operation of the alleged 28 intelligence-gathering program their complaints purport to describe.

Moreover, even if Plaintiffs' claims would not prohibit outright the alleged federal intelligence-gathering program in violation of the Supremacy Clause (which they would, for all the reasons described above), their claims would still be unconstitutional because they have a far more direct and obstructive effect on alleged federal activities than the state regulations at issue in North Dakota. While North Dakota considered state laws that resulted in only a small increase in the government's cost of procuring liquor for military bases, the state-law claims in these cases would "substantially interfere with [the Federal Government's] activities." New Mexico, 455 U.S. at 735 n.11. Plaintiffs not only would require the federal government to alter its alleged manner of gathering military intelligence, but also seek to impose massive damages on Verizon for allegedly cooperating with the alleged federal program. Were Plaintiffs' claims permitted to proceed, the threat of facing such damages under the laws of fifty states would undoubtedly deter private companies from cooperating with the federal government, a result that would not simply make it more costly for the government to engage in its alleged activities, but would substantially interfere with the government's ability to carry out those alleged activities at all. See also United States v. County of Humboldt, 628 F.2d 549, 553 (9th Cir. 1980) (invalidating state tax levied on military personnel living in rent-free military housing because applying the tax would reduce soldiers' incentives to enlist and thereby disrupt and interfere with military recruitment process).

III. CHULSKY'S FRAUD CLAIMS MUST BE DISMISSED UNDER RULE 9(b)

The Chulsky Plaintiffs make no attempt to show that their fourth claim satisfies the particularity requirement of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 9(b). They argue only that compliance with that rule should be excused because Rule 9(b) does not apply to claims of misrepresentation. Opp'n at 23. But the cases on which Plaintiffs base that argument involve claims for negligent misrepresentation. See In re Cendant Corp. Sec. Litig., 190 F.R.D. 331, 336-337 (D.N.J. 1999) (denying motion to dismiss claim for "negligent misrepresentation"); Forte Capital Partners v. Cramer, No. C07-01237, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 40126, at *22, 2007 WL 1430052, at *8 (N.D. Cal. May 14, 2007) (Rule 9(b) not applicable to claim for "negligent misrepresentation"). When a misrepresentation claim sounds in fraud, the heightened pleading standard of Rule 9(b) must be satisfied. In re Cendant Corp., 190 F.R.D. at 337; Vess v. Ciba-Geigy Corp. USA, 317 F.3d 1097,

1 1103-1104 (9th Cir. 2003) (Rule 9(b) applies to allegations of fraudulent conduct).⁴

2 Here, the Chulsky Plaintiffs’ misrepresentation claim sounds in fraud, not negligence. The 3 fourth claim, titled “malicious misrepresentation,” alleges that Verizon made material 4 misrepresentations “knowingly, without belief in [their] truth, or in reckless or careless disregard of 5 the truth,” Chulsky Am. Compl. ¶ 98, and “with the purpose of inducing” Plaintiffs’ reliance on the 6 misrepresentations, id. ¶ 99. The Chulsky Plaintiffs nowhere suggest that Verizon acted only 7 negligently. The claim is therefore subject to Rule 9(b). See In re Daou Systems, 411 F.3d at 1028; 8 Shapiro, 964 F.2d at 287. And since the fourth claim does not satisfy Rule 9(b)—a point Plaintiffs 9 do not contest—it must be dismissed.

10 The Chulsky Plaintiffs’ sixth and eighth claims—which they concede are subject to Rule 11 9(b)—are likewise defective. To satisfy Rule 9(b), a claim must state “the time, place, and specific 12 content” of the allegedly false representations, as well as the identities of the parties to the statement.
13 Edwards v. Marin Park, Inc., 356 F.3d 1058, 1066 (9th Cir. 2004); Schreiber Distrib. Co. v. Serv- 14 Well Furniture Co., 806 F.2d 1393, 1400-1401 (9th Cir. 1986). “Mere conclusory allegations” are 15 insufficient. In re Heritage Bond Litig., 289 F. Supp. 2d 1132, 1146 (C.D. Cal. 2003). None of the 16 Chulsky claims that sound in fraud satisfies that standard. See Verizon Mem. at 13-14. The Chulsky 17 Plaintiffs cite three paragraphs of their amended complaint to show they satisfy Rule 9(b). Opp’n at 18 24 (citing Am. Compl. ¶¶ 92, 97, 125). But those paragraphs—like the remainder of the amended 19 complaint—fail to state the time, place, or specific content of Verizon’s alleged misrepresentations.⁵
20 All three of the Chulsky claims sounding in fraud must therefore be dismissed.⁶

21
22 ⁴ See also In re Daou Systems, Inc., 411 F.3d 1006, 1027 (9th Cir. 2005), cert. denied, 546 U.S.
23 1172 (2006) (claim under § 11 of Securities Act is subject to Rule 9(b) if complaint “sounds in 24 fraud” even though § 11 contains no element of fraud); In re Stac Elecs. Sec. Litig., 89 F.3d 1399, 1404-1405 (9th Cir. 1996) (same); Shapiro v. UJB Financial Corp., 964 F.2d 272, 287 (9th Cir.
1992) (same).

25 ⁵ See Am. Compl. ¶ 92 (alleging generally that Verizon “impliedly and expressly promised to protect 26 the privacy and confidentiality of its customers’ information”); id. ¶ 97 (Defendants “acknowledged 27 their duty” to protect confidentiality of information); id. ¶ 125 (citing unidentified “promotional 28 literature and/or written notices and/or other written material”); see also id. ¶ 106 (basing sixth claim on alleged misrepresentation Verizon made “in its interactions with Plaintiffs”).

⁶ The cases the Chulsky Plaintiffs cite in support of claims six and eight are inapposite. In one case, involving claims of wire fraud, the plaintiffs described the dates, locations, and specific details of allegedly fraudulent transactions. See Odom v. Microsoft Corp., 486 F.3d 541, 554-555 (9th Cir.

1 IV. FAILURE TO IDENTIFY THE CONTRACTS AT ISSUE REQUIRES DISMISSAL

2 Even under the notice pleading standards of Rule 8 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, a 3 claim for breach of contract that fails to identify the contract that is the basis of the claim must be 4 dismissed. See Verizon Mem. at 15 (citing cases). The third and seventh Chulsky claims fall well 5 short of this standard. Although the claims refer generally to unspecified “agreements” and 6 “promises,” Chulsky Am. Compl. ¶¶ 91, 92, 97, as well as unidentified contracts, warranties, notices, 7 “and/or” signs, id. ¶ 117, they do not identify with any specificity the particular agreements, 8 contracts, warranties, or promises which were allegedly breached. Unable to counter this argument, 9 the Chulsky Plaintiffs submit that a claim for breach of contract need not attach the contract that is 10 the basis of the claim or plead it in its entirety. Opp’n at 24-25.⁷ That is no answer. The defect in 11 the Chulsky contract claims is their failure to identify the relevant contracts or contract terms. See 12 Verizon Mem. at 15.⁸ The third and seventh claims should therefore be dismissed.

13 CONCLUSION

14 For the reasons set forth above, Verizon’s Motion To Dismiss the Chulsky, Riordan, and 15 Bready Complaints should be granted.
